The college of further education in one city had a modern site and many facilities for its large population of students. The campus had a number of catering options, three or four separate restaurants and a shop. All were accessible, although very busy. The college provided a range of general student support services and these services were clearly advertised in the main concourse of the college. The college also had a well-established student council. The students with learning difficulties we met were, however, unaware of the student council and were certainly not represented on it. It seemed that thinking about inclusivity had not extended to the student council.
